People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with

speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the

Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech

deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with

speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the

Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information

about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone

companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information

about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for

them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech

deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with

speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the

Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information

about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone

companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information

about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for

them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech

deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with

speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the

Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information

about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone

companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information

about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for

them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech

deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with

speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the

Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information

about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone

companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information

about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech

deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with

speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the

Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information

about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone

companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information

about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech

deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with

speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the

Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information

about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone

companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information

about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech

deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with

speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service. People with speech disabilities who could use Speech-to-Speech deserve to know about its availability. The FCC must adhere to Section 225 of the Telecommunications Act in administering its regulation of STS. Thus, the FCC must allow telephone companies that provide STS to recover sufficient payment to make it financially advantageous for them to undertake outreach efforts to inform all potential users about STS. Few Americans with speech disabilities know that STS exists. By law, Americans with disabilities must receive information about telephone services appropriate to their disabilities, just as all Americans receive information about general telephone service.